What Is Women’s Studies?
The Women's Studies Program at the University of Central Florida is an interdisciplinary discipline using research and teaching to focus on the relations of gender among various races, ethnicities, sexualities, and other differences in our society.

Through its curricular and co-curricular programming on campus, the Women's Studies Program enhances diversity and supports women and their endeavors. Off campus, the program recognizes its responsibility to serve the larger Orlando community by striving to build and sustain partnerships that demonstrate the pragmatic importance of the issues concerning the program.

Women's Studies isn't anti-male or just for women. A background in Women's Studies allows students, both male and female, to acquire critical thinking tools to analyze and navigate our contemporary society; a broader perspective on the issues facing women in today's world; the ability to analyze the ways in which lives are shaped by gender and other forms of diversity; teamwork skills and deeper insight into women's and gender issues.

Service Learning

Each semester undergraduate students in the UCF Women’s Studies Program turn knowledge into action by completing Service Learning projects with community partners. In the classroom, students learn theories and methods of analyzing women’s roles in history and contemporary society as well as the importance of activism on behalf of women.

With Service Learning, students take that knowledge into the community and learn how to make social changes with the help of community organizations. Students complete fifteen hours of community service and deliver a final project based on that partnership. They present their work to their peers and write a final reflective essay linking their community activism with their classroom knowledge of women’s and gender issues.
